

Mizan Kiros Mirutse is an Ethiopian physician with a Master's in Global Health, Health Financing and Economics. He is currently finalizing a PhD in Health Economics at the University of Bergen, Norway. Through his extensive academic training, ten years of professional experience in the Ethiopia health sector (including director for resource mobilization, Director General of Ethiopia Health Insurance Agency, Senior Health Financing Advisor to the Minister and National Covid-19 response Coordinator) and active participation in global health platforms, Dr. Kiros is an expert in global health, health systems, and health economics and financing. He had been also a national lead person for HIV prevention and control program in MoH-Ethiopia. He has number of publications in health financing and health economics including economic evaluations and collaborated and led different research projects.

Dr Kiros is a visiting lecture in Harvard School of Public Health since 2018 for a “Advanced modeling for Health System Analysis & Priority Setting” course and supervise master's students. He is a steering group member of global initiative such as International Society on Priorities in Health Care and Global Joint learning network for Universal Health Coverage.